OCLC Number: (OCoLC)24996260 Subject: Ocean circulation -- Mathematical models. Excerpt: . . . In performing the objective analysis, we consider the data 4 field shown in Figure as the true data field. If one suppresses a certain amount of data and performs the objective analysis on the remainder to reconstruct the height field, the Figure 3 (top) shows a plot of the above exact solution true solution would serve as a basis to estimate the accuracy of the problem. Comparison of top and bottom panels of or curacy fidelity of the analysis procedure. If the basin considered were a real ocean basin, the elimination of the solution and the exact solution. residuals would take into account the errors expected in the sea surface topography associated with the circulations from the sources mentioned earlier over various parts of the ocean basin. Since the basin under consideration here is a simple idealized one, we have suppressed the given in Figure illustrates this topography which also 4 (4.5). data on a purely random basis and performed objective analysis on the remaining data without introducing any errors of a high pressure pattern over most of the basin with the in the data. The height field shown in Figure was calculated 5 maximum occurring approximately at a...
