ARCHITECTURAL RENDERING IN WASH i THE PRELIMINARY STEPS A successful rendering begins way back with the bare drawing board. The careful man will choose the best board he can find. He will test the edges to see if they be true, free from bulges and hollows which would throw the T-square up or down, for accuracy is essential to complete success; friezes, or the narrow whites of cornices or flights of steps must be the same width throughout. He will clean the board carefully, remove old edges of former mounts and old paste. Then he will sandpaper it with fine sandpaper and if there are any humps in the surface, hammer them down carefully. Bad hollows and old thumb-tack holes may be filled up with a mixture of very thin glue (or very thick glue-water) and whiting, sandpapered smooth after drying. Now why on earth these precautions Because lumps and hummocks under the paper to be mounted on this board cause dirt and graphite to collect on the paper over the lumps, and such collections are very difficult to erase. Also, with a singular perversity, they always come in the worst possible places on the drawing. Also, old paste when dampened again by the wet paper sticks to the underside of it and the only way to part them is to whittle a chip out of the board and pare it off of the paper. Paper. All this labor may be delegated by those...
